Election results give clear mandate to pro-European forces In Eastern Ukraine 300 people killed in 10 days despite cease fire

For the first time in its young history as an independent state, the Ukrainian government is now one overwhelmingly composed of figures oriented towards a Western future. This is what most scares Vladimir Putin, who is unlikely to relent in his efforts to render the country a failed state for having the audacity to move out of Russia's orbit. Now, more than ever, Ukraine needs the help of those who profess to stand for the ideals of freedom and democracy. <http://goo.gl/IERYVd>

For nearly 10 million voters, the Oct. 26 parliamentary elections became the day when they gave a clear mandate to pro-European political forces. <http://goo.gl/Lfxfi2>

Friends for Now: Can Poroshenko, Yatsenyuk work together?

Significant number of ‘new’ MPs voted for Jan 16 dictatorial laws

Ukraine’s next government will be a pro-European coalition built across several political parties, with President Petro Poroshenko likely to rely on his alliance with a strengthened Prime Minister Arseniy Yatsenyuk. <http://goo.gl/2vhiju>

Along with a clear pro-European mandate, the newly elected parliament so far appears to be the least captive to oligarchic interests, which for years remained intensely allergic to outside competition. <http://goo.gl/xEtoJR>

The question on many minds after the election is whether the winners of the Oct. 26 election will be able to work together and advance a reform agenda to overhaul Ukraine’s fragile democracy and economy. <http://goo.gl/VJEJrQ>

Two days after Ukraine’s Oct. 26 parliamentary election Arseniy Yatsenyuk’s party People’s Front is nearly tied with the Petro Poroshenko Bloc with the parties receiving 22.17 percent and 21.81 percent, respectively, with 99 percent of the vote counted. <http://goo.gl/guHEIQ>

Despite active campaigning to ensure that voters knew which MPs voted for the January laws aimed at crushing peaceful protest, freedom of speech and civil society in general, it is believed that around 65 MPs who voted for them have been re-elected. <http://goo.gl/aQKy19>
